Mathiew R. Fox, 38, of Kenosha
(Kenosha County Sheriff's Office)

Court records show Mathiew R. Fox is currently facing a serious felony case in Kenosha County Circuit Court, where prosecutors allege he stalked a former partner and repeatedly violated a harassment injunction. The criminal case represents the most recent escalation in a legal saga that spans criminal, civil, and family law, and reaches from circuit court to the Court of Appeals and the Wisconsin Supreme Court.

Earlier case resolved without criminal conviction

Before the current felony prosecution, Fox avoided additional criminal charges through a plea agreement tied to a Kenosha Police Department investigation. Under that agreement the State explicitly declined to issue charges under Wis. Stat. § 942.09(2)(am)1, § 942.09(2)(am)3, and § 942.09(3m)(a), statutes involving the nonconsensual recording, possession or dissemination of intimate images.

In exchange, Fox entered a plea to a county ordinance violation, resulting in a civil forfeiture rather than a criminal conviction. The agreement imposed conditions, including compliance with court orders and prohibitions against further conduct covered by the declined statutes. The State retained the ability to pursue the previously declined charges if those conditions were violated.

Repeated restraining orders across multiple relationships

Records show that three separate women have sought temporary restraining orders or harassment injunctions against Fox over the years. One petition was later withdrawn. Another remains potentially pending, and a third has been subject to renewal proceedings. In each instance, the petitions alleged unwanted contact or conduct, though the outcomes varied.

In one injunction hearing, the court found that Fox crossed a line by threatening to damage a woman's professional reputation through employer contact, concluding that such conduct warranted injunctive relief.

Judges reject civil lawsuits tied to family disputes

Fox has also filed multiple civil actions arising from family and personal disputes. Two of those cases were dismissed by Judge David Wilk, who rejected Fox's attempts to reframe family-court issues as standalone civil lawsuits.

In one case, Fox declined to proceed, telling the court he did not wish to incriminate himself. In another, the judge dismissed the action outright, stating that the claims were not a proper civil lawsuit and that family-related disputes must be addressed in family court, not through collateral litigation against third parties.

Filings span circuit court to Wisconsin Supreme Court

Across the past several years, Fox has filed hundreds of pages of pleadings, motions, letters, and exhibits. His filings appear in circuit court, the Court of Appeals, and the Wisconsin Supreme Court, often overlapping with active proceedings in other branches. Many filings accuse judges, guardians ad litem, attorneys, and prosecutors of coordinated wrongdoing.

The documents share consistent stylistic markers, including identical formatting, repetitive legal phrasing, and the repeated use of a family crest watermark as a background image. The language, structure, and sheer volume of filings reflect extensive use of artificial intelligence tools to generate and refine legal arguments. Most documents filed are simply nonsense.

Prosecutors allege continued contact despite court orders

In the current felony case, prosecutors allege Fox engaged in a pattern of conduct directed at a former partner that caused fear and emotional distress, while knowingly violating an active harassment injunction. The criminal complaint cites repeated online postings, communications, and third-party contact as part of that pattern.

If convicted, Fox faces significant prison exposure under Wisconsin law, in addition to potential penalties on related misdemeanor counts.

Allegations expand to judges, police, prosecutors, and media

Throughout his filings and communications, Fox alleges sweeping conspiracies involving the court system, guardians ad litem, attorneys, law enforcement, and county officials. He has also blamed Kenosha County Eye for the loss of his employment, asserting that media coverage triggered his termination.

Fox contacted the outlet repeatedly over an extended period, submitting lengthy emails, documents, and video recordings demanding coverage of his allegations and later demanding removal of published reporting. He even submitted an op-ed for consideration. It was denied.

Escalation documented across years of litigation

Taken together, the record shows a consistent pattern: repeated injunctions sought by multiple women, a prior plea agreement that kept serious allegations from becoming criminal charges, civil lawsuits dismissed by the court, and an extraordinary volume of AI-generated filings accusing the justice system itself of wrongdoing.

Fox’s criminal case remains pending. Whether the courts ultimately impose criminal penalties or additional restrictions, the filings themselves document years of escalating conflict, litigation, and allegations, culminating in the felony prosecution now before the Kenosha County Circuit Court.

Court records show that today he was again found in contempt of court and sentenced to jail, marking the third time a court has imposed a jail sentence against him in this matter. At a contempt hearing, the court found he intentionally and deliberately disobeyed prior court orders in two separate ways: by using Our Family Wizard, a court-approved co-parenting communication platform, to discuss issues unrelated to the children, and by sending payments through the mail instead of using the court-ordered payment method within the platform. The court rejected his explanations and ordered a 120-day commitment to the Kenosha County Jail, but stayed the sentence and imposed purge conditions. Those conditions require that he send no mail to his former spouse, not use Our Family Wizard to discuss the case, and appear for all court proceedings for the next three years. In civil contempt cases, purge conditions operate as a compliance mechanism, allowing a person to avoid serving jail time only if they strictly follow the court’s directives going forward.
